SYNOPSIS

Marcus is a young man with a disability who is bullied and dies when a vicious prank goes wrong. He then comes back from the grave as a killer clown, to exact revenge on those who have wronged him. He is guided by other killer clowns, who have their own slapstick methods of causing death and destruction.

One of Marcus’ few friends in life was his neighbor Amy, a lesbian college student with a big heart. As the deaths pile up, Amy is determined to learn the deadly secret behind the recent wave of murders, not realizing that she may be putting herself and her loved ones in danger.
ABOUT THE FILM

Clowns in the Woods is an independent horror movie with creepy villains, twisted kills, and a spooky small-town atmosphere.

In the tradition of Candyman and Nightmare on Elm Street, Clowns in the Woods is about the sins of the past, as a younger generation must grapple with the consequences of past injustice.

Directors Adrian Esposito and Curt Markham have been fans of horror films since a young age, especially independent regional horror films. They wanted to create a horror movie inspired by the 2016 clown sightings, and to include people with disabilities in both the story and the production.

Since co-director Adrian Esposito is on the Autism spectrum, the filmmakers feel this film is important because it has the potential to break the mold of how people with disabilities are seen. For this reason, Clowns in the Woods also cast an actor with a disability in the prominent role of Marcus.

There is a common prejudice against low-budget horror movies. The makers of Clowns in the Woods want to show that there is value in horror genre storytelling. Not just by diving into the worlds of make-believe and dark fantasy, but also in showing a unique approach to diversity. The villains who display prejudice get their just desserts, and audiences will hopefully find sympathy with the disadvantaged characters.
Adrian Esposito

Co-director Adrian Esposito’s previous credits include producing and writing the narrative film Bury My Heart With Tonawanda, a period piece about an outcast boy with Down Syndrome who is taken in by the Seneca Tribe. He has also directed several feature-length documentaries such as Greetings from Tromaville (spotlighting the work of Lloyd Kaufman and Troma Entertainment) and Diffability Hollywood (about the history of people with disabilities in films).

Adrian’s work has gained national recognition. He won the prestigious NYSARC Self-Advocate of the Year Award and was honored to be the recipient of the ARC National Executives NCE Lifetime Achievement Award in filmmaking. He is a two-time recipient of the Los Angeles Red Nation Film Festival Courage Award. In 2016, he was named “Filmmaker of the Year” at the Buffalo Dreams Fantastic Film Festival and his film Diffability Hollywood won as Best Documentary Feature at the same festival.

Adrian is a spokesperson for self-advocates, helping the world accept people with disabilities as capable and thus seeing their disabilities as “diffabilities.” The topic of disability representation is close to Adrian’s heart, since he is himself a part of the disability community. Adrian has autism. His life experiences bring a unique perspective to his films that resonate with many people facing similar challenges in life. Adrian feels that his autism works well with his filmmaking. “People with this disorder tend to hyper focus on an area of interest, my interest area has always been movies,” says Adrian.

HORROR WITH A PURPOSE

For the co-creators of Clowns in the Woods, filmmaking is a lifelong passion. Their own independent approach to storytelling is mirrored in the film's of outsider characters and their struggles with an uncaring community. Of course, being a horror movie, the main character of Clowns finds a way to come back from death to exact revenge on those who wronged him in life.

From the time he was a teenager, Adrian Esposito has made films about underdogs, the abused, and victims of discrimination. His documentaries are about survivors of WWII, native peoples and their spiritual beliefs, characters with disabilities, even independent filmmakers who buck the system. From a young age, Adrian loved films by independent voices and iconoclasts, including Roger Corman, Tom Laughlin, and Lloyd Kaufman. All of whom Adrian had the pleasure of meeting and interviewing through his film projects.

Curt Markham also embodies the ideals of the independent filmmaker. Curt is a graduate of NYU’s film program, with an MFA in imaging arts and computer animation from the Rochester Institute of Technology. He has never been one to wait for permission to make films. Curt is more interested in picking up a camera and getting his stories told. In his independent features Curse the Darkness and Saberfrog, characters struggle to find purpose and identity, all against a fantastical sci-fi backdrop.

Adrian and Curt have collaborated on many projects, including the documentaries Diffability Hollywood and Greetings From Tromaville, and the narrative feature Bury My Heart with Tonawanda. For Diffability Hollywood, the goal was to give an overview of the history of disability portrayals in film and television, as well as representation behind the camera. The title of the film comes from the concept that those with "disabilities" have different abilities, or "diffabilities." We as a society should find ways to include them in all aspects of life, including entertainment. If those with disabilities make up twenty percent of the population, we should strive to include them in the stories we tell.
For Bury My Heart with Tonawanda, Adrian wrote a script about a character with Down Syndrome who is shunned by his family but taken in by the more accepting Seneca tribe of Native Americans. Ultimately, that role was played at various ages by multiple actors with Downs.

Adrian and Curt have continued that effort to feature characters and actors with disabilities. When thinking about another narrative feature to collaborate on, Adrian thought a character with autism at the center of a horror film would have possibilities. For Clowns, the inspiration would come from the recent clown scares of 2016. In what became a media frenzy, people all over the country reported evil clown sightings. Although these stories were more a case of mass hysteria than an actual evil clown problem, the idea made great fodder for a horror film. If there were actual killer ghost clowns, what would drive them? What would make a clown come back from the grave? Adrian wrote it up as a screenplay, and Curt expanded it, bringing in the Amy character and mystery-solving aspect.

In classic slashers, the killer is often a mentally unstable person. This outcast villain is treated as an "other," someone different who should be feared. With Clowns, there was a conscious decision to make the different person more sympathetic. His vengeful actions are brought into question and the audience is invited to ask the question, are anger and revenge the answer?
In casting the character of Marcus, a bullied young man "on the spectrum," the producers were lucky to find Dalton Letta. Dalton, who has autism, has an impressive list of credits in community theater, including a boisterous portrayal of Shrek in Shrek: The Musical. His voice and enthusiasm were perfect for underdog Marcus and later his evil clown persona.

Nolan Tierce, an actor with Down Syndrome, plays Dan, Marcus' friend and the heart of the film. Dan is a person Marcus turns to for advice, and is ultimately the conscience to guide the way.

Amy, played by Roselyn Kasmire, has her own challenges in life. Her homosexuality has made her an outcast in the eyes of her mother. Amy struggles to maintain balance in her life, but her acceptance of Marcus is never in question.

With Clowns in the Woods, the filmmakers have strived to make an entertaining story that touches on themes of inclusivity, embodied both in front of and behind the camera.
